Beyond the large glass partition of the living room, an orme pleureur, its entire form appearing bristled, blazed a deep wine color as it caught the setting sun from the valley diagonally below. Its trunk, split in two from the root stock, resembled the backs of two giant figures in raincoats, seated and hunched over – a colossal being, dejected and weeping.

When the curtains are drawn back, a thicket of chestnut trees blocks the view from the window. At night, the falling nuts repeatedly strike the ground with resounding thuds.

There is no escaping that tree; one must face it squarely. Indeed, that tree is unmistakably weeping. “Pleureur” refers to branches that cascade and droop, laden with sorrow., 2024
